Dear Colleagues,

We are two months into the integration planning process and are moving forward quickly. We want to share with you the progress the teams have made, and let you know where our focus is for the near-term. We'll also give you direction on how to find out more about the integration and how we can ensure your concerns are addressed.

To date, our two companies have already:

- oHeld multiple town hall meetings and visits at both Merck and Schering-Plough;
- oEstablished a high level of interaction and cooperation among the integration planning teams from both companies;
- oConducted productive off-site meetings and began looking for value from both revenue and cost opportunities; and
- oStarted thinking through how the future organization will function.

We also just released the merger proxy statement in the U.S., also known as the S-4. This is one of a few important milestones in the merger. You can read more in The Daily.

It's too early in the planning process to expect big decisions about the key issues on many people's minds – the final organizational structure, our global facilities and job reductions. More information about these topics will be shared once available. Most importantly, combining our two companies is about building a new Merck -- one that takes the strengths of both organizations to create a new leader in global healthcare.

As we progress rapidly in our planning, we've begun to think about the exciting ways the combined company can create more value. Value creation brainstorming is happening at the team level at both Merck and Schering-Plough. In time, we'll have more details to share with you on how this value will help drive the new Merck.

At this point in the integration, we have shifted our focus from mobilizing to planning for the future. Ensuring business continuity on Day 1, while also creating new value going forward, rests side by side with compliance and regulatory issues.

Phase 2 of integration planning is focusing on:

- oAssessing revenue opportunities and cost synergies
- oEnsuring our plans focus on the customer
- oDeveloping an approach to design the new organizational structure, starting at the top
- oPlanning for Day 1 (expected to be in the fourth quarter of 2009)

Focus on People

The Human Resources teams are working closely together to help guide talent selection practices and exemplify the new cultural attributes (Customer Focus, Courage and Candor, and Rapid, Disciplined Decision Making) in the way we operate for Day 1 and beyond. The teams have also begun to map out an approach to organized labor around the world. In addition, the Merck integration team along with Merck leadership is determining the design approach for the combined company's organizational structure.

Key Divisional and Functional Progress

Each divisional and functional team planning for the integration has been focusing on the key activities we need to deliver for Day 1. The merger of our two companies should be seamless to our customers and external partners. Our planning must capture that goal.

The Human Health teams for both Merck and Schering-Plough have held a number of planning meetings for integration on both a divisional and regional basis. The R&D teams continue to plan across the spectrum of research and development functions, allowing better understanding of how both Merck and Schering-Plough organize, make decisions, govern and operate Research and Development. In Manufacturing, 16 sub-teams are spending a great deal of time understanding the plant network structure as well as Schering-Plough's global quality operations.

Across the functional areas such as Human Resources, Finance, IT, Legal and Facilities, similarly high levels of direct interaction are taking place. In IT, for example, a significant amount of planning includes ensuring continuity of email, phone and other services after the merger. The Legal and Finance teams are looking at legal structures for our company and operating units around the world; Human Resources is outlining the effect of the planned merger on employee plans and programs; and the Facilities team is reviewing our respective sites, considering the impact of site decisions on our business operations, our employees and communities in which we work.

In addition, Day 1 integration planning for Schering-Plough's Consumer and Animal Health businesses continues to move forward.

Integration Information and Answers

For more information on the integration, please read The Daily. We also want to hear from you, and have set up a special mailbox for your questions and comments -- Integration@merck.com .. While we cannot answer each question individually, we will certainly keep your ideas and inquiries an important consideration in our work.

In the meantime, one of the most important jobs of all rests with every one of you. It is vital that each of us stays focused and drives the business. This is the foundation for the promise of the New Merck.

Sincerely,

Adam Schechter and Brent Saunders
